

CLUSTERFUCK EVE

I can tell you, it'll sure be hard to sleep tonight as I ponder the possibilities of tomorrow's MI Clusterfuck Primary. Polls show that Romney might just pull this out—and surprisingly, at least one of those polls says he'll do so with Republican support.

“As the undecided voters make up their minds, more are turning to Mitt Romney than to John McCain. We have also seen the participation among Republicans increase from 62% last night to 75% at the end of phoning tonight. That means that 75% of the voters taking part in the GOP Primary identify themselves as Republicans,” Steve Mitchell, president of Mitchell Interactive said.

Rasmussen has a similar projection for the number of Republican primary voters who will be Republican. And the Free Press claims that 0% of Democrats polled said they'd vote a Republican ballot—a laughable number, IMO. If those numbers are correct, it may mean "Uncommitted" will have a come from behind victory on the Democratic side as more Democrats listen to party leadership and decide to vote in the meaningless Democratic primary. I'd actually be thrilled with an "Uncommitted" victory in MI—it describes how I'm feeling right now perfectly. But like said, the 0% is a laughable number.

But what I'm really looking forward to is for Joe Lieberman and John McCain to stop spamming me (or rather, some Republican named Margaret) with robocalls and junk mail. McCain is even doing an event in Washtenaw County, a sure-fire sign he thinks Democrats might put him over the edge again. Though why he believes Lieberman is going to help make that case, I don't know.

I still have gotten a robocall from Huck yet, which was the only reason I would cross-over to vote for Mitt. There's still time yet, but for now, I'm hoping our clusterfuck ends in the only logical fashion: uncommitted.