

WE GET TO SEE THE HATFILL WARRANT

Judge Lamberth has just ruled that the government has to unseal the materials it submitted to get search warrants related to Stephen Hatfill (h/t scribe).

This should be fun.

After all, it's telling enough that the government doesn't want us to see the search warrant application. And one of the reasons the government didn't want to release the materials is because it wants to keep the identity of a confidential informant secret; I do hope we'll be able to tell whether they had something more than people who had analyzed the writing on the envelopes to point to Hatfill.

But given how flimsy the government's case against Ivins remains, I look forward to seeing what they were thinking back earlier in this process.
