

LIZ "BABYDICK" CHENEY RETURNS

It was inevitable. Given the news over the weekend that DOJ might investigate PapaDick Cheney, we had to expect Liz "BabyDick" Cheney would be out again defending her Daddy (and, just as inevitably, the press would give her the soap box to do so).

But as more and more investigations start to focus on her Daddy, BabyDick sounds more and more pathetic. For example, here's her attempt to scold Democrats for upholding the rule of law.

CHENEY: His reaction to the story that we may well be prosecuting folks, I'm happy to talk about that. ... You know, he is very angry, as you've heard him say publicly. You know the notion that this administration is going to come into office and they're going to prosecute the brave men and women who carried out this program that kept America safe. It is, it is un-American. It's something that hasn't happened before in this country, in terms of somebody taking office and then starting to prosecute people who carried out policies that they disagreed with, you know, in the previous administration. He's been very public about that.[my emphasis]

Um, no. Depending on who you ask, Holder is considering prosecuting either those who overstepped the stated policy and/or those—like her Daddy—who ignored the law when they developed that policy. But BabyDick has to characterize a potential investigation in terms that conflict with everything Obama and Holder have said about a torture investigation so people don't note that her—and her Daddy's—cries of "un-American!!" are really just self-serving claptrap.

As if it would be un-American to tell PapaDick
he has to follow the law.

Not only didn't he—as the guy who redirected efforts in Afghanistan to an illegal war of choice in Iraq—keep us safe. But just about everything he did was un-American.
