

DC'S NEWEST REALITY SHOW

And speaking of C Street, it looks like the moralizing hypocrites at C Street are shopping for a new roomie.

Sen. John Ensign has moved out of the C Street house, the Christian home he shared with other elected officials on Capitol Hill that came under scrutiny for its residents' beliefs and practices and their role in trying to end the Nevada Republican's affair with a campaign staff member. The red brick town house emerged this summer as the subject of political intrigue – not only as a pivotal location in Ensign's affair with Cynthia Hampton, but also that of South Carolina Republican Gov. Mark Sanford, who sought guidance there as he wrestled with his own affair.

As fallout from Ensign's affair continues with a preliminary Senate Ethics Committee investigation and talk of a possible criminal inquiry by the Justice Department, Ensign decided to move out, not wanting to draw further attention to his longtime home.

There's only one way to replace Ensign. To invite six avowed Christian Freshman Congressmen to participate in a reality show—a test, week by week, of who can be a bigger moral hypocrite. Each week, we'll vote off one participant (who, thereafter, will have to pay market rates for a place in DC).

So I'm looking for two kinds of input. First, candidates to enter the reality show. You might start with this list.

And then we need a catchy name, so we can pitch the show to Bravo. My suggestion (which sucks—but then I'm busy watching football) is Praying for the Pay.

Enter your candidates—and name suggestions—in comments.