

PAUL MANAFORT HAS CONDUCTED HIS OLEG DERIPASKA DALLIANCE ON PRISM PROVIDER GOOGLE'S SERVERS

The government just docketed this declaration pertaining to its accusation that Paul Manafort contributed to an op-ed defending his actions in violation of the judge's prohibition on trying his case in public.

The substance of the declaration (and another copy of the op-ed showing track changes) is interesting enough. But I'm most interested in this:

От: Paul Manafort <pmanafort@dmpint.com>
Дата: Thursday, November 30, 2017 at 5:14 AM
Кому: Константин Килимник <kk22314@gmail.com>
Тема: <no subject>

While Manafort is using a company email (DMP International, LLC), his interlocutor, Konstantin Kilimnik, the guy through whom Manafort was offering to provide private briefings on the Trump campaign to Russian oligarch (and former Manafort client to whom he still owed millions) Oleg Deripaska, is using Gmail.

Particularly once the government developed counterintelligence concerns about Paul Manafort (but probably his ties to powerful Russians are sufficient in any case), Kilimnik is easily targetable under Section 702. While I'm sure they've got Deripaska wired up in a slew of other ways, NSA can collect this email just by asking Google nicely. And once it opened a full investigation into Manafort, the FBI has been able to get whatever NSA gets in raw form.

That means, among other things, that Kilimnik

(and, I assume, Deripaska) want this to be discovered. Perhaps that's arrogance, a belief that somehow Manafort will remain untouchable by Mueller for the more substantive coordination between him and Russia. Or perhaps Deripaska is just happy to let Manafort be exposed for what he is.

Whatever it is, when obvious Russian targets use PRISM providers, they're just inviting easy scrutiny.
