

HOW PAUL MANAFORT LIED TO MUELLER TO PROTECT JARED KUSHNER

Paul Manafort appears to have saved the President's son-in-law by lying to Mueller's prosecutors.

That's what his 302 from September 13, 2018, released yesterday under FOIA, appears to show.

The 302 records the last interview before he sealed his plea deal (starting at PDF 223). Much of it focuses on how the campaign dealt with WikiLeaks. The 302 includes the following topics:

1. A reminder that on the previous two days, Manafort had lied about meeting Konstantin Kilimnik in February 2017, but after being shown travel records in this interview he admitted it.
2. Mostly redacted (for ongoing investigation likely tied to Roger Stone's prosecution) discussions about how Manafort didn't want Trump "distracted by the titillation of a WikiLeaks release."
3. A claim that the RNC would handle press on the WikiLeaks release, even though three Trump staffers had been strategizing just that for weeks.

4. Manafort's claim he was surprised by the "Russia are you listening" comment, which is consistent with other people's claims, if unbelievable.
5. Language designed to sustain a claim that Manafort had no idea why Trump attributed the stolen emails to Russia in his "Russia are you listening" comment.
6. A claim that no one suspected Trump of "colluding" with Russian before Robbie Mook made the allegation.
7. A discussion that ties the two October 7 events (the release of the Podesta emails and the Access Hollywood tape) with details of his own crimes in Ukraine, along with an admission that Manafort spoke to Trump about all that.
8. Manafort's claims to be absolutely ignorant about whether Trump had any entanglements with Russia.
9. Lies about (almost certainly) Steve Calk's awareness that his bank loan paperwork submission was false.

Between topic 8 and 9, the 302 also captures the basis for one of Mueller's claims that Manafort lied during his cooperation agreement, an allegation (that Judge Amy Berman Jackson upheld) that Manafort lied about another DOJ investigation to protect someone.

I laid out what the breach determination disclosed about the investigation here. Basically, shortly before Manafort left the campaign, someone (which it's now clear is almost certainly Roger Stone and indeed appears to have come up in Stone's trial) offered up a way to save the candidate. The question is how closely involved someone else – someone with a 7-character name – got involved in this effort to save the candidate. According to the breach proceedings, Manafort told one story that incriminated the person with a 7-character name when first interviewed, prior to getting his plea deal, on September 13 (that is, in this 302). But when Mueller's team brought prosecutors from another investigation in to hear the story on October 5, Manafort at first gave a very different version, one that was much less incriminating to that 7-character name person, a version that aligned with the story that person was telling the FBI at the time, and that put more of the blame on the 5-character name person, presumably Stone.

It appears highly likely that the person he was protecting was Jared Kushner.

In the breach hearing (discussion starts on page 110), the names of both people involved are redacted.

That -- so this is one where there are real details being given. And the next version that happens, what we, of course, then, as we noted, brought [REDACTED] [REDACTED] was relevant to that investigation, and had them come here. And the story omitted everything, basically, about Mr. [REDACTED] saying that and, instead, there was a very watered-down version related to Mr. [REDACTED] and -- who specifically, Mr. Manafort had previously said, I did not want to be involved in this at all.

As I disclosed in 2018, I provided information to the FBI on issues related to the Mueller investigation.
