

325,000 PEOPLE VOTE IN FIRST DAY OF EARLY VOTING IN GEORGIA

I voted 25 days ago; my vote was received 22 days ago.

It has taken the interim three weeks before people living stateside have started getting into the fun – nowhere more so than in Georgia. Over 325,000 people voted in yesterday's first day of early voting.

You can go here to track early vote in each state. It shows that Georgia's turnout is promising, but by no means dispositive for Kamala Harris. Almost 30% of people who voted yesterday were Black (about the same percentage as they made up in 2020 exit polls, but still three percent short of eligible Black voters); 54% of people who voted were women (two percent short of their 2020 exit poll rate). According to AJC's Greg Bluestein, over 45,000 of the people who voted yesterday did not vote in 2020.

68% of the people who've voted early in Pennsylvania so far are registered Democrats (though Biden had a much bigger percentage of early voters in 2020 than Trump).

Total Voted by Party Registration

| Party | Total Voted | Percent |
|--------------|----------------|--------------|
| Democrat | 284,331 | 68.4 % |
| Republican | 95,383 | 23.0 % |
| None/Minor | 35,714 | 8.6 % |
| TOTAL | 415,428 | 100 % |

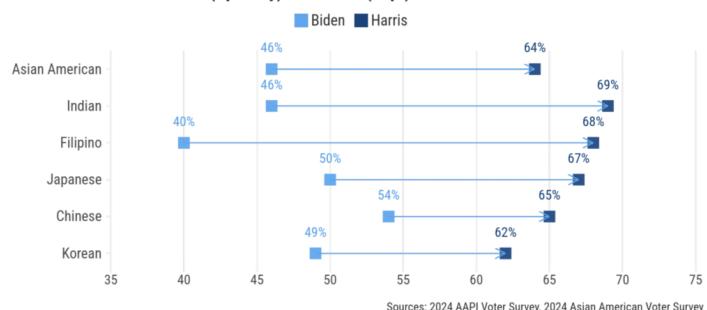

Almost 56% of people who've voted in Michigan are women, a few points higher than 2020 exit polls.

But there are cautions for Democrats, too. The Nevada Independent's Jon Ralston doesn't have the same same confidence that the Democrat will win Nevada as he has had in recent years.

Plus, almost no one can track this well, because the last two elections – the first Dobbs election and the COVID presidential – are so unusual.

Perhaps the most interesting stat I've seen in the last day is this poll, showing (unsurprisingly) that Kamala Harris is picking up a far greater percentage of the AAPI vote than Biden was, particularly among Indian-American voters.

2024 Vote Intention: Biden (Apr/May) and Harris (Sept)

This is a significant (over 4% of the vote) voting block in NV, GA, PA, MI, and NC, but doesn't always get tracked in cross tabs. It could be that we've spent months talking about whether Harris, who would be the first Black woman President, would match normal Democratic support among Black voters (who tend to come home late), while missing that Indian-American voters could put the first Asian-American President over the top.

As of today, Donald Trump has <3% of his campaign left (20 of 721 days).

As of today, Kamala Harris has over 18% of her campaign left (20 of 107 days).

Every one of those days is a chance to get less likely supporters out.

Update: Bluestein also confirms what other people had jumped the gun to report: Jimmy Carter's vote for Kamala Harris was dropped in the dropbox at the Sumter County Courthouse.
