

HEY FBI?!? WHO PUT THE TIN IN YOUR ANTHRAX?

The FBI's case against Bruce Ivins continues to crumble. In this installment, we learn there are ingredients in the samples used in the attacks that are not present in Ivin's so-called "smoking gun" flask of anthrax.

BOY, THAT ANTHRAX ATTACK SURE LED TO AN EXPANSION OF OUR ANTHRAX PROGRAM, HUH

At the still-unsolved anthrax attacks in 2001, people were raising concerns that we were breaking our treaty obligations not to do such research. But the attack led directly to a ten-fold expansion of our program.

USAMRIID CAN'T KEEP TRACK OF ITS MICROBES

Remember how one key to the FBI case against Bruce Ivins is their claim that only he had access to the flask that contained the anthrax strain used in the attack—and that they're sure that there were no other flasks of the strain? Well, it turns out that Ivins' lab, USAMRIID, shut down all research on Friday because they don't have a good inventory of all their high-risk microbes.

THE HATFILL SEARCH

Aside from the fact that Stephen Hatfill's girlfriend kept her own bottle of Cipro hidden inside a Mason Jar full of coffee, the most interesting part of the searches conducted on Stephen Hatfill in 2002 is his Florida storage locker. It appears to be a collection of Hatfill's toys left over from his days in Zimbabwe and elsewhere. ## FBI: YES WE STILL HAVE OUR ANTHRAX SHINY OBJECT

In an article on the anthrax case, Joby Warrick lets the FBI once again show off its shiny object of new forensics, without providing answers to many of the outstanding questions in the case.

On CSPAN3 and via the Committee website (though the latter didn't work for me).

The two big issues will be the new guidelines for FBI investigations—which may allow racial profile—as well as the laughable case the FBI made that Bruce Ivins was the sole killer in the anthrax attack.

In an opening stated, Jerrold Nadler revealed that the FBI would not give staffers on HJC the new guidelines—they were able to see
